Power Met Test Under McKisson

Drover's Son Worked Quietly, Strengthened Fences
With Senator Burton.

Maurice Maschke was a drover's son who inherited his father's ability to work quietly and with determination. He was known for his ability to strengthen fences, a task that required a steady hand and a keen eye for detail. His work ethic was admired by many in the community, and his contributions were recognized by his friends and neighbors.

Stimson Met McKisson

He Met McKisson after World War II ended, and they became good friends. McKisson was known for his quiet demeanor, and Maschke respected his wisdom. The two men shared a strong bond, and Maschke often sought his advice on matters both personal and professional.

He Was for Friend

Maschke never met a man of whom he did not say, "He was for friend." His friends appreciated his loyalty and his ability to keep his promises.

G. O. P. Politics

Maschke was active in G. O. P. politics for 40 years. He was known for his dedication to the party and his willingness to work hard for his beliefs. His contributions were recognized, and he was often sought out for his advice on political matters.
